Information About The Consortium for Diversified Psychology Programs and The National Psychology Advisory Association

1. The Consortium for Diversified Psychology Programs (CDPP) monitors and influences regulations which permit alternative program graduates to sit for licensure through an organization of students and graduates of CDPP institutions of higher education. The organization is called The National Psychology Advisory Association (NPAA). (Virginia Licensure Questions about Suzanne)
- NPAA has established bylaws and is administered by a Chairperson, Vice Chair-person, Secretary-Treasurer, Regional Coordinators (officers of NPAA who coordinate education, national and political activities in the states of their region relevant to licensure, employment, and third-party insurance payments). Three CDPP professors serve as advisors to NPAA. About 400 students and graduates of CDPP psychology programs are members of themselves to their district legislators, to attend meetings of the Board of Psychological Examiners of their states, to participate in public hearings on amendments, sunset psychology acts, and proposed changes in licensing acts and regulations. They are also encouraged to join the Association for Humanistic Psychology (which supports alternative programs) the American Psychological Association (APA), and the State APA affiliate. They are asked to write to the Board of Psychological Examiners in their state and request notice of proposals to adopt amendments or make changes in the psychology act and/or regulations of the state. The officers of NPAA and advisors work together to plan strategies with reference to due process and equal privileges and opportunities and to seek formal and informal interactions with state legislators, administrative agency officers, and members of boards. In addition, officers of CDPP consult the Federal Administrative Procedures Act, State Administrative Procedures Acts, and Federal and State Registers - all of which are relevant to monitoring and influencing regulations on licensures and certification.
2. Members of CDPP include the psychology departments of 12 regionally accredited universities, the Association for Humanistic Psychology, and the Association for Humanistic Education. The universities are:

Center for Humanistic Studies
 Duquesne University
 John F. Kennedy University
 Saybrook Institute
 Seattle University
 Sonoma State University

Temple University
 Union Institute
 University of Chicago
 University of Dallas
 Walden University
 West Georgia College

3. A list of alternative programs is available in brochure form through Mike Arons, West Georgia College, Carrollton, GA 30018.
4. At the present time, the only states, to our knowledge, in which graduates of alternative programs, such as The Union Institute's Professional Psychology Program and Saybrook Institute, are facing difficulties are: Oregon, Iowa, Connecticut, Georgia, and Maryland. Florida has also not been "conducive to alternative psychology programs" until recently when Union graduates were permitted to sit for the exam.

The best way of obtaining information about licensure relevant to alternative programs is to join the National Psychology Advisory Association. The Association publishes a quarterly newsletter. If you are interested, please write to either:
